They should register that they are doing so but should not need prior authority. This way if there is a concern about legitimacy of any collector this can be reported and then checked for legitimacy. The way I see this it would make it easier for children or parents collecting or selling raffle tickets for school, scouts, or other such groups fundraising simpler and more achievable.

I think most people can figure out if they are legitimate . So if selling tickets outside a business permission from said business should be all that is required Absolutely needs to be regulated. So many scammers, we need to protect our elderly and vulnerable.

Include regulations to ensure unobstructed passage. This supports people with disabilities to move freely.

- Getting permission from Council ensures legitimacy. - It is important that collectors ensure unobstructed passage. - Council having designated sites which have space could be appropriate. This would help with developing a sense of consistency and predictability for the blind and vision impaired. - Collectors should obtain permission from the shop they are outside.

No collection of donations or selling lottery tickets. This opens up to 'begging' and people being scammed.

Don't have any concerns with how this works currently. Could be a simple online registration process (with no fees), acceptance of clear and practical guidelines and ability to contact those responsible if any complaints made and standard process to invite feedback, issue restrictions or penalize if further breaches made.

Donations should always have easy access to the public. Lottery ticket sales should be restricted from being easily accessed.

Fraud is on the rise...keep the regulation

I think you should still have some regulation around this, but not sure how

Should be no limits. Fraud is a police matter not council

Yes, a written authority and some sort of online publicly accessible declaration and ID of the people involved, so public can quickly check. A small processing fee of no more than $20 could be collected to maintain the database.

Written authority seems a reasonable requirement for legitimate fundraising activities on public ground.
